"We are called by the magnitude, the existential magnitude of the challenges before us to really expand our imaginations and the analysis we apply when we ask a question like, what is the impact here? What matters? What you and I are talking about here doesn't lend itself to measuring in terms of something so reductive as a number or a monetary value. Whether we just developed the capacity and the vocabulary and the stamina and the ways of speaking together to ask those questions and then live by the answers that they yield, it's the difference between merely surviving or the possibility of flourishing."

Here is a concise summary of the key points from the conversation:

Christa Tippett discusses the importance of asking profound questions about the human condition, rather than rushing to find definitive answers. She emphasizes the need to "live the questions" and engage in moral imagination, rather than succumbing to cynicism or despair.

Tippett sees this era as a critical time for humanity to mature and transform, moving beyond simplistic solutions and embracing the complexity of challenges like climate change and social division. She advocates cultivating qualities like patience, hospitality, and a sense of wonder - both individually and collectively.

Tippett is concerned about the breakdown of traditional institutions like journalism, religion, and media, which have struggled to grapple with polarization and the limits of "objectivity." She believes we must find new ways to speak truthfully about the human experience, beyond just reporting facts.

Ultimately, Tippett believes the key to creating positive change lies in the interior work of calming our nervous systems, accompanying each other through difficulty, and tapping into our innate human capacities for creativity, moral deliberation, and care. She sees younger generations as crucial to this evolutionary process for humanity.

matters? What you and I are talking about here doesn't lend itself to measuring in terms of something so reductive as a number or a monetary value."
