Housing is safety from the elements of the climate. We need housing to be a human right and there needs to be spaces/land where the community builds and manages their homes/apartments/duplexes/fourplexes/tiny home. We must shift the paradigm of builders having control. By the logic of competition, even though I don't like competition, I like working together as a community, we need an example of the community taking charge of their residency.

Rent is predatory capitalism.

The idea that rent reflects predatory capitalism stems from concerns about how the housing market operates, particularly in urban areas. Critics argue that high rents can lead to financial strain on tenants, contributing to issues like displacement, homelessness, and the inability to save for other needs. This perspective views landlords and real estate companies as prioritizing profit over the welfare of individuals and communities, leading to a system where basic human needs for shelter become commodified.

When something is built, material is bought and labor is paid. That should be the end of it.

Housing is a human right!
